Huge hoard of Anglo-Saxon treasure found in UK

AP – Terry Herbert at Birmingham Museum, Birmingham, England, Thursday, Sept. 24, 2009, with a small portion of the treasure

By RAPHAEL G. SATTER, Associated Press Writer
Associated Press Writer – Thu Sep 24, 2009

LONDON –

It's an unprecedented find that could revolutionize ideas about medieval England's Germanic rulers: An amateur treasure-hunter searching a farmer's field with a metal detector unearthed a huge collection of Anglo-Saxon gold and silver artifacts.

The discovery sent a thrill through Britain's archaeological community, which said Thursday that it offers new insight into the world of the Anglo-Saxons, who ruled England from the fifth century until the 1066 Norman invasion and whose cultural influence is still felt throughout the English-speaking world.

"This is just a fantastic find completely out of the blue," Roger Bland, who managed the cache's excavation, told The Associated Press. "It will make us rethink the Dark Ages."

The treasure trove includes intricately designed helmet crests embossed with a frieze of running animals, enamel-studded sword fittings and a checkerboard piece inlaid with garnets and gold.

One gold band bore a biblical inscription in Latin calling on God to drive away the bearer's enemies.

Sacramento Valley Detecting Buffs

The Anglo-Saxons were a group of Germanic tribes who invaded England starting in the wake of the collapse of the Roman Empire. Their artisans made striking objects out of gold and enamel and their language, Old English, is a precursor of modern English.

The cache of gold and silver pieces was discovered in what was once Mercia, one of five main Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, and is thought to date to between 675 and 725 AD.

For Terry Herbert, the unemployed metal-detecting enthusiast who made the discovery on July 5 while scouring a friend's farm in the western region of Staffordshire, it was "more fun than winning the lottery."

The 55-year-old spent five days searching the field alone before he realized he needed help and notified authorities. Professional archaeologists then took over the find.

"I was going to bed and in my sleep I was seeing gold items," Herbert said of the experience.

The gold alone in the collection weighs 11 pounds and suggests that early medieval England was a far wealthier place than previously believed, according to Leslie Webster, the former curator of Anglo-Saxon archaeology at the British Museum. "We also cannot say who the original, or the final, owners were, who took it from them, why they buried it or when? It will be debated for decades."

She said the crosses and other religious artifacts mixed in with the military items might shed new light on the relationship between Christianity and warfare among the Anglo-Saxons — in particular a large cross she said may have been carried into battle.

The hoard was officially declared treasure by a coroner on Thursday, which means it will be valued by experts and offered up for sale to a museum in Britain.

Proceeds will be split 50-50 between Herbert and his farmer friend, who has not been identified. The find's exact location is being kept secret to deter looters.

Bland said he could not give a precise figure for the value of the collection, but said the farmer and Terry Herbert could each be in line for a "7-figure sum."

Kevin Leahy, the archaeologist who catalogued the find, said the stash includes dozens of pommel caps — decorative elements attached to the knobs of swords — and appeared to be war loot. He noted that "Beowulf," the Anglo-Saxon epic poem, contains a reference to warriors stripping the pommels of their enemies' weapons as mementoes.

"It looks like a collection of trophies, but it is impossible to say if the hoard was the spoils from a single battle or a long and highly successful military career," he said.

Experts said they've so far examined a total of 1,345 items. But they've also recovered 56 pieces of earth that X-ray analysis suggests contain more artifacts — meaning the total could raise to about 1,500.

The craftsmanship was some of the highest-quality ever seen in finds of this kind, Leahy said, and many British archaeologists clearly shared his enthusiasm.

Bland, who has documented discoveries across Britain, called it "completely unique." Martin Welch, a specialist in Anglo-Saxon archaeology at University College London, said no one had found "anything like this in our country before."

Herbert said one expert likened his discovery to finding Egyptian Pharaoh Tutankhamen's tomb, adding: "I just flushed all over when he said that. The hairs on the back of my neck stood up."

The collection is in storage at the Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery, where some of the items are to go on display starting Friday October 2, 2009.

Sacramento Valley Detecting Buffs

It's unclear how the treasure ended up in the field, although archaeologists suggested the gold may have been buried to hide it from roving enemies, a common practice at the time. The site's location is unusual as well — Anglo-Saxon remains have tended to cluster in the country's south and east, while the so-called "Staffordshire hoard" was found in the west.

In the meantime, archaeologists say they're likely to be busy for years puzzling out the meaning of some of the collection's more unusual pieces — like five enigmatic gold snakes or a strip of gold bearing a crudely written and Biblical inscription in Latin.

"Rise up, O Lord, and may thy enemies be dispersed and those who hate thee be driven from thy face," reads the inscription, believed to be from the Book of Numbers in the Bible.

Also of interest is the largest of the crosses, which experts say may have been an altar or processional piece. It had been folded, possibly to make it fit into a small space prior to burial, and the apparent lack of respect shown to such a Christian symbol may point to the hoard being buried by pagans.

"The things that we can't identify are the ones that are going to teach us something new," Leahy said.

For England, a country at the edge of Europe whose history owes an enormous debt to the Anglo-Saxons, the find has the potential to become one of its top national treasures, according to Webster.

Caroline Barton, assistant treasure registrar at the British Museum, said objects over 300 years old and made up of more than 10 percent precious metal are only offered for sale to accredited museums in Britain, so the collection will not be leaving the country.

Rick's SVDB T-Shirts

Rick Costello still has a few T-Shirts printed with the SVDB logo for sale. Rick will take additional orders at the November meeting. The $18 price tag includes a portion of the money going to SVDB.

Beach Hunting Tips by Lee Wiese

After the October meeting Lee Wiese gave an informative talk on Metal Detecting Saltwater Beaches. He used visual aids and had several handouts in his presentation.

Lee said that hunting saltwater beaches can be both rewarding and fun if you take the time to study the beach profile. This will help you in determining the most likely places to hunt for those lost treasures.

Lee also talked about the various metal detectors to use for the different types of beach hunting.

Lee gave a great presentation (as usual) and those in attendance got many tips for improving their salt water beach hunting skills. Thanks Lee!

The New California Gold Rush

Bernie has been gold prospecting for the past 25 years. He lives in his caravan parked on the East Fork of the San Gabriel River.

Bernie says that since the economic crisis more people have come to the river looking for gold.

Within an hour of downtown Los Angeles, people are seeking that one sure commodity.

"I'm here to find gold," said Kevin Brown. "I'm a studio lighting technician in Hollywood, between the writers strike that happened last year, and the Screen Actors Guild, whatever they want to call it.

Lately I've had to turn to having to do it for extra cash."

Geologists estimate that during the gold rush of 1849 in California, about 80 percent of the gold was never found. Today with the price of gold soaring and the economy falling, the idea of panning, digging or diving for precious metal has become serious business.

"There are definitely gold nuggets down in the bottom here," Brown said. "Just a matter of getting 30 feet down lower than any old timer or modern prospector has done before."

Sneak Preview of New Gold Bug Detector- $549

The Gold Bug is being reintroduced as new and improved for a November 2009 release. The Gold Bug is a 19 kHz detector that is light in weight and offers both all metal and discriminate modes. Unlike the original Gold Bug the new Gold Bug has more versatility due to the adjustable discriminate mode. This will make it useful for jewelry, relic, and even coin detecting.

Finding "Time" To Beach Detect

I was detecting on a beach and an old fellow walked up to me and said "Hey if you find my watch I'd really appreciate it if you'd give it back to me.....It's easy to identify because my name is on it"

I said "sure no problem...what's your name"?

And then with a twinkle in his eye he said, "Rolex"
